ARCHITECTURAL DESCRIPTION

Very little of the original house remains in the present building, only parts of three walls and a chimney. It was a 1½-storey, single-pile, rectangular structure on a very low foundation, its brick laid in five-course American-with-Flemish bond like that in the main house. It possibly followed the side hall plan, but that it is difficult to determine now. It had a very steeply pitched gable roof and probably faced west, as the main house does. Later a two-storey gambrell-roofed stable, considerably larger than either the original or the present house, was built around it, using the north and west walls and retaining the east and possibly south walls as interior partitions. A large carriage entrance was opened in the west wall. The new east and south walls were of used brick laid in five-course American bond; part of the south wall remains. The present house is a 1½-storey L-shaped building facing east toward St. Clair Avenue some distance away. It utilizes the east, north and part of the west wall of the original house and the south wall of the stable. The new walls are of used brick laid in stretcher bond, on old foundations in some cases. The gable roof is covered with composition shingles and follows the steep pitch of the original house's roof. There are two gable-roofed, weatherboarded dormers on the facade, another on the south side of the eil, and a shed-roofed bungalow dormer across the west side. Windows are double-sash, six-over-six and eight-over-eight light, with brick sills and plain surrounds; none are original. Besides the original northern interior end chimney with fireplace, there is a small interior chimney on the west side. The veranda has a concrete floor and a shed roof supported by four square posts. The floor plan is irregular.

HISTORICAL DESCRIPTION

The 18th century Thomas W. Lewis house at Locust Grove had burned before George Sinclair purchased the 534 acre tract from Dr. Thomas W. Meriwether in 1839 (ACDB 37-438). Tradition says that this small 1½-storey house was built immediately for the family to live in while the main house was under construction. After Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair's deaths, the property was purchased by the Locust Grove Improvement Company for subdivision (ACDB 98-341). Judge John M. White bought the main house and 11 surrounding acres in 1893 (ACDB 98-427, 99-175), and it may have been at that time that a large brick stable was built around the old house. White's executor sold the house and 4.4 acres to Col. J.A. Cole in 1915 (ACDB 159-146). Judge Lemuel F. Smith, the father of the present owner, bought it in 1923 (City DB 45-361). The stable was torn down in the early 1930's but the foundation and part of the south wall remained, as well as the east, north, and a small part of the west wall of the original house.

GRAPHICS

Mr. and Mrs. Downing Smith were deeded this part of the property by his parents in 1946 (DB 129-474) and built the present 1½-storey, L-shaped house, utilizing what remained of the two previous buildings. They now live in the main house and use the old house as a two-unit rental cottage.

Locust Grove Gates Now Gone

City Has Overtaken Plantation

By DAN FRIEDMAN

"Locust Grove," Mr. and Mrs. Downing Smith's imposing four-story home of late Georgian design on Locust Avenue in Charlottesville, is a good example of a meticulous and loving preservation of an historic residence.

With some of the best houses both in the city and county threatened by the bulldozer, developments or sheer neglect, it's reassuring to see a place of historic significance so well attended to.

Situated on four acres of extensive gardens and magnificent old trees, Locust Grove has been the Smith family home since 1913 when Judge Lemuel Smith — a former Virginia Supreme Court Justice and father of the present owner — purchased the property.

The 12 room red-brick mansion was originally a part of the Nicholas Meriwether grant of 1735, and associated, therefore, with Meriwether's Charlottesville home, "The Farm," still standing on Farm Lane. And on September 19, 1839 — according to the Historic Landmark Survey — a Meriwether descendant sold 534 acres for $16,000 to George Sinclair, who built Locust Grove a year later.

During the Civil War Gen. Philip Sheridan raided the area and a Union regiment occupied Locust Grove, carrying off horses, servants and other valuables. Mrs. Sinclair at the time reputedly was nursing a seriously wounded Confederate soldier and successfully concealed his presence.

One of the real splendors at Locust Grove today — and an indication of how large the early plantation once was — is its group of fascinating outbuildings. A guest house on the south lawn — which the Smith's use as a rental property — is older than the main house and was made from the bricks of the old dismantled slave quarters. There's a charming two-story brick kitchen building with a massive chimney behind the house which is used as a garage, and an original smoke house with elaborate brick cornice work which the owners have converted to a second guest house.

"Before the land was subdivided in the late nineteenth century," Mrs. Smith said, "the entrance gates for Locust Grove were located where Martha Jefferson hospital is today — five long city blocks away."

The main residence is a fairly standard four-over-four-over-four — that is, four rooms and a hall on each of the three main floors. The full attic — which is used for storage — has lovely dormer windows. All the rooms are of noble proportions. The ceilings on the first floor are 12 feet high, and there's a fireplace in every room and beautiful hand-painted ceramic tiles at the base of each fireplace.

The house is decorated with a fine collection of family furniture and antiques, including an old clock in the living room and a pair of beds upstairs which were made by Smith's grandfather. In addition, there are some interesting Chinese vases which Smith's mother received from her first cousin, writer Pearl Buck.

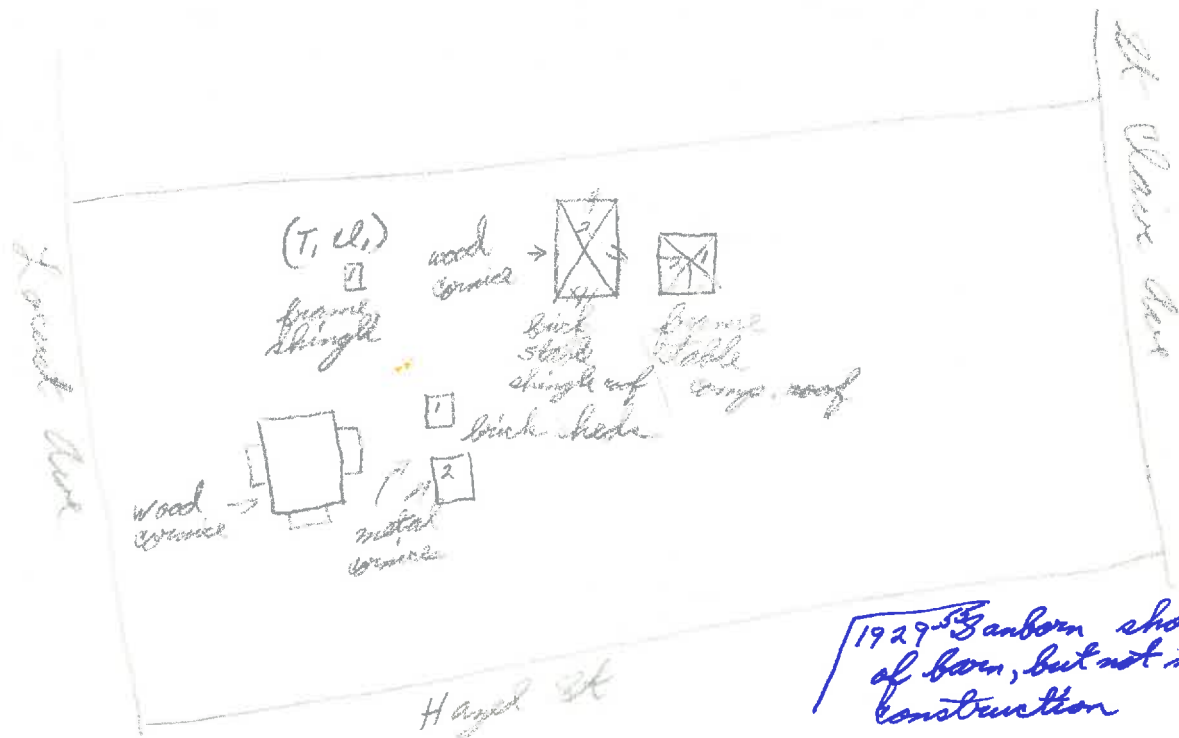

"The place is home to us," Mrs. Smith said. "My husband has lived here since he was six years old, and, quite simply, we couldn't live anywhere else."
